

Making repression lose

Repression is all forms of physical and psychological violence that are intrinsic to the daily enforcement of all states, of all democracies.

The continuous expansion of its tools to punish, to persecute and to imprison is maybe its most obvious realization.

The generalized internalization of its notion of “justice”, and the omnipresent confusion that personal fulfillment happens through work and consumption is surely its greatest achievement.

But repression loses.

Each time we rebel, spit in the face of the moral colonization of this system, and sabotage it.

Each time waves of revolt expose the limits of the control of the state, and render a complete end to it imaginable.

Each time our actions discard the smoke screen of lies and make us sense that our freedom is to be found in attacking authority and not in obeying it.

Repression has everything to lose.
